Bourbon Iron Furnace

During the settlement of Kentucky, pioneers were forced to leave behind heavy belongings during their journey west. Once the settlers arrived on their claims, homesteading required items such as kettles, plowshares, and numerous other iron products. The Bourbon Iron Works was an immediate success. The firm shipped goods as far as Lexington by 1794. Iron became even more of a commodity during the War of 1812, when Americans boycotted British goods. Bourbon Iron Works also became famous during that conflict when General Andrew Jackson, anticipating an attack from the British on New Orleans, purchased shipments of cannonballs from the Kentucky furnace. The supplies were loaded on barges and shipped down the Mississippi River. The shipment proved imperative to Jackson's victory at the Battle of New Orleans. Because of this, the Bourbon furnace was dubbed the "Old Thunder Mill" until it was decommissioned in 1838.

Constitution Square

Visit Constitution Square in Danville. Constitution Square Historic Site was the birthplace of Kentucky's statehood. In 1776, Kentucky was still a frontier and a county of Virginia. The Wilderness Road, blazed by Daniel Boone, led pioneers through the Cumberland Gap and into Central Kentucky. Danville's prominent location on the Wilderness Road caused it to become a crossroad for early settlers, and a center of political activity. By 1785, Danville was chosen as Kentucky's first seat of government, and a meetinghouse, courthouse and jail were built to administer the growing territory. On June 1, 1792, Kentucky became the fifteenth state in the union, and Isaac Shelby, a Revolutionary War hero, was named the first Governor of the Commonwealth.
